

HORSE CLINIC

with animal communicator and teacher Laila del Monte and Patrick Allori, horseman and trainer

Two different ways of communicating with horses are now being united with the experience of Laila and Patrick. Both their ways help us to understand intuitively and objectively the needs of our horses. The Native American culture which connects with every living being in nature is the basis for these two different approaches.

Laila's approach increases the intuitive capacities of each human being. Her technique develops one's knowledge to analyze the information that we receive from the horse. This information is registered in us at a deep level of consciousness, but we do not know how to decode it.

Patrick, the horse trainer, uses the traditional methods of the TSITSISTAS (Cheyenne) to connect freely with the horse in the round pen. The aim of this method is to receive direct information of the horse's genetic experience. The utilization of this information has an almost immediate effect and leads to the harmonization of the horse's natural defense system.

The association of Laila's and Patrick's methods, both of which exist within the cultural experience of indigenous people, forms a necessary basis to interpret the needs of performance horses today. The performance that is required from the horse in the athletic discipline of our days, is the result of a practice that is always more and more demanding. This can lead to the loss of trust and collaboration on behalf of the more sensitive horses. We can therefore avoid relationship conflicts with our horses by adopting this strategy of understanding and harmonization. Not only is this possible, but it has been confirmed by direct experience with high level performance horses, that the strategies proposed by Laila and Patrick succeed in reeducating extremely difficult behavioral cases.
